TWO WESTVACO FORESTERS WIN NATIONAL ARBOR DAY AWARD

The prize-winning Pet Tree project, developed in cooperation with the Virginia Forestry Association, is an informational program directed primarily towards elementary school groups, grades one through three.

Contributing time and trees, the Westvaco program was a resounding success in making the school groups aware of the aims of the Arbor Day observance, by encouraging thousands of elementary school students in the southeastern states to "plant a tree and discover a friend."

Each of the more than 6,000 loblolly pine seedlings distributed had a "pedigree tag" which gave comments on the tree's personality together with information on the correct way to plant and care for them. The students also received a booklet describing their new "friends."

A slide program, shown at the request of teachers to classes participating in the Pet Tree project, filled a "tremendous need for this kind of information" in the primary educational field according to letters and notes of appreciation received by Westvaco.

In 1975, Westvaco won a national Arbor Day Foundation award which was received by Frederick W. Kinard, Jr. of Summerville, S. C., Wildlife and Reforestation manager for Westvaco's Timberlands Division. The award recognized Westvaco's efforts in the promotion of reforestation and woodlands management.

Westvaco, which has established successful ongoing forest management assistance programs, and provides professional forestry guidance to both resident or absentee woodland owners, cooperates closely with U. S., state and regional organizations which also furnish various services and programs to woodland owners.
